

Dr. David A. Rude is responsible for promoting learning initiatives that drive high performance across a civilian workforce of 800,000 employees. With his unique perspective on talent development, he achieves success by incorporating contemporary competency-based learning interventions into civilian leadership and development programs. By building partnerships and alliances across the DoD, Dr. Rude is positioning the Department to become a talent development exemplar. He has earned degrees in business administration, public administration, and an Ed.D. from The George Washington University. His vast research interests include emotional intelligence, organizational culture, and adult learning.